

Kingsmeadow Reacts To... The KFC Crisis

Recently, well-known chicken brand KFC has fallen under an unfortunate chicken shortage because of their chicken supplier (DHL) failing to deliver chicken to their restaurants.

This is, obviously, an absolute catastrophe, as a lot of people are going without chicken. This also affects KFC financially, as they're not selling anything for the foreseeable future.

The 'closed' notice on the doors of all their restaurants reads:

"We deliver our chicken fresh into our restaurants, but we've had a few hiccups with the delivery today. We wouldn't want to open without offering our full menu, but we'll be back at the fryers as soon as we can!"

Here's year 7 student Evan's opinion on the recent happenings: "This doesn't seem as much of a problem as other things such as wars and starvation. It's just a minor setback in the KFC brand. There's nothing really bad happening with the situation currently; it's just a shortage."

Another year 7 student, who wished to remain anonymous, had this to say about it: "It's disgraceful because they are a popular brand and they have no more chicken. What are the suppliers thinking? They have to be refilling the chicken excessively because everybody loves chicken."

The problem should be fixed in the coming days or weeks, and soon enough KFC will be up and running again.
